CONQUISTADOR ORANGE PUDDING

Chocolate and orange has long been considered one of the classic combinations. This wonderful pudding contains a whole fresh orange at its heart, which infuses the cooking with its bittersweet flavour. Sanguiuelo oranges work well in this recipe (what we used to call 'blood oranges' when we were children), to add a little extra bite.

Takes 1½ hours / serves 6-8

butter for greasing tin	150g unrefined caster sugar
1 whole unseamed orange	3 eggs
100g dark chocolate, broken into small, even-sized pieces	25g cocoa powder
150g butter	150g self-raising flour
	2 tsp milk

Butter a 1kg pudding basin (be generous). Cut into the orange skin and flesh six times, approximately 2cm in depth; this will allow the flavours to infuse the pudding.

In a heatproof bowl, melt the chocolate. Using an electric whisk, blend together the butter and sugar, add the eggs and whisk again. Pour in the melted chocolate, add the cocoa and whisk until smooth. Fold in the flour, until blended, then mix in the milk.

Spoon one third of the mixture into the prepared pudding basin, place the orange in the middle, then add the remaining mixture and spread to seal in the orange. Cover with cling film and tie with string, making a handle to lift. Put in a large saucepan, pour in enough hot water to come halfway up the side of the pudding basin, then place on the hob with a lid on and bring to the boil. Reduce to a gentle simmer for 2 hours, constantly checking the water and adding more if needed. Carefully remove from the saucepan, gently ease a palette knife around the edge, place a large plate on top, invert and give a shake and lift the pudding basin off. Serve with chocolate sauce or ice cream.

When Cortez's conquistadors plundered Empress Montezuma's palace they found not silver and gold but huge quantities of cocoa beans.
